- “The Cobb County School District is not engaging in book-banning or book-burning. We are following well-established federal and state law and policies and practices of this District that have been with us for years, if not decades.”
- “We have an independent professional obligation to protect students from lewd and vulgar materials regardless of whether any parent, group, or outside entity files a complaint.”
- From closing: "I want to be very clear. This situation is about right and wrong, good, and evil. There is no middle ground in this situation. You are either in favor of providing inappropriate material to children or you are against it. I assure you. I am against it, and I will not be moved.

Could you make this into a graphic with the Superintendent? "I want to be very clear. This situation is about right and wrong, good, and evil. There is no middle ground in this situation. You are either in favor of providing inappropriate material to children or you are against it. I assure you. I am against it, and I will not be moved.

Yeah, it's getting more difficult for people to be in favor of this stuff when it's brought out from behind the "book banning" scare narrative.

In the interest of full transparency, we should invite her to read publicly from selected pages of the books she and her band of lemmings want put back in school libraries.

She won't do it; that's the point. It's easier to talk about "censorship" without revealing the reason why.
